

Labrador

In April 1878 sugar farmer Robert Muir and investor John Lennon bought 139 acres of portion 62 of Crown Land, originally known as Southport North. Portion 62 fronted the Broadwater from Biggera Creek to Broad Street, and the future Billington Street formed part of the western boundary, which continued north until it reached Biggera Creek. The land was surveyed and divided into 19 sections not long after its purchase. When the allotments were sold they were advertised as part of 'Mr Muir's Central Southport Estate'. The land overlooked the expanse of the Broadwater and was a good spot for fishing.

Robert Muir was a Scottish engineer, who had previously sailed around the Labrador Peninsula, a large coastal area in north eastern Canada. It is believed he named his newly acquired land after the Labrador Peninsula, where the streams and small islands bore a resemblance to the terrain along the Broadwater.

In 1881 the general manager of the Queensland Cobb & Co coach service, Frederick Shaw, built the Labrador Hotel. It was destroyed by fire in 1888 but the name Labrador was perpetuated by other landmarks such as the vanished Labrador Creek, a residence called Labrador House and eventually the Labrador State School, which opened in 1921.

Biggera Waters

Biggera Waters derived its name from the Yugambeh language word 'bigera', which refers to the red iron bark tree (eucalyptus sideroploia). Originally part of Labrador, the area north of Brisbane Road to Biggera Creek was officially named Biggera Waters in 1982.

Enjoy your walk down memory lane.

Aim for 10,000 steps a day

Get up, get out and get active – every step counts! Use the Labrador Heritage Walk to help you reach 10,000 steps a day and enjoy better health. To help you keep track, the distance of each walk is provided in steps as well as metres. You can also keep count of your daily steps by borrowing a pedometer from your local Gold Coast City Council library.

The Labrador Heritage Walk was funded by the Queensland Government Community Renewal program coordinated by the Department of Housing, with additional funds and project management from Gold Coast City Council and Queensland Health.

Heritage Walk Labrador

*“ There have been many days
spent at the Broadwater with our children. We've watched it grow into a great family place. Harley Park offers families a day out with little or no cost involved and everybody can enjoy themselves. It always has and always will be a special place to me and my family.”*
